My big fat Greek divorce

Greece and the euro zone are stuck in an abusive relationship relationship founder. Greece's to other vulnerable prime minister, Alexis Triprax, has charged its creditors with trying to humiliate the country; se has accused the tate of "crimnal responsibility" for Greece's raffering. Prominent euro-zone politicians are saying openly that, without a deal to release rescue funds in the next few days, default and "Grexit" loom.

The urgency is because of a repayment of €x.5 billion ift.7 billion), which Greece seemingly cannot afford, to the IMF on June 50th and because Greece's European bail-out expires that: day. One the last-disch negotiations that have become a Eurospeciality: just after The Economist went to press, finance ministers were to assemble in Luxembourg; leaders may meet over the weekend; a European Union summit is scheduled at the end of next week. It may come down to a bead-to-head between Mr Tsipras and Angela Merkel, Germany's chancelinr. A deal is still possible, but the sides have come to loathe each other. If this were a marriage, the lawyers would be circling.

Divorce would be a disaster-fire everyone. The trouble is that, unless Greece and the euro zone change the terrus of their relationship, staying together would not be a great deal better.

To use why start with the results of a default and Greek After arguing on and off for five infuriating years, some have begun to welcome the prospect. They are making a mistake.

For Greece the gains from defaulting would be slight, and the costs potentially vast. True, the country could walk away from debts of Eur billion, or almost 180% of GDP. But that is worth less to Greeks than it sounds. Although the debt is huge, it is at bargain-hasement interest tines and repayable over decades. Interest payments until the early 2020s are just 3% of GOF a year. Even for Greece, that is manageable. Nor would leaving the eum do much good, In theory, with a new drachma and its own central bank, Greece could devalue and gain competitiveness. But Greece's trade is modest, And it has already lowered nominal wages by 16 % without a boom in exports.

By contrast, the cost of Grexit would be exorbitant: bust banks, slashed savings, broken contracts and shattered confidence (see page 63). Politics could be devastated. Syriza, Mr Tsipras's hard-left party, is anti-market and anti-enterprise. Neofascist Golden Dawn and the Communists, with a combined 12% of the vote, would thrive. Most of the parties in the middle, already discredited, would struggle. This week Mr Isipras was due to play footsie with Vladimir Putin in Russia. Ejected from the euro, and possibly the EU, a country with a history of chip that must not be coups would risk becoming violent and even more corrupt.

That is one reason for the euro zone to think twice before actually good for Gree itching Greece. Levende doden

Matter | San Francisco

Het syndroom van Cotard is een angstaanjagende psychische aandoening die mensen verandert in zombies, in geesten die ademhalen. De mensen die eraan lijden denken dat ze dood zijn. Ergens in hun hersenen ligt mogelijk de sleutel tot het menselijk bewustzijn.

Ik ben naar Mexico-Stad gekomen om de Levende Doden te bezoeken.
