Digg's Biggest Problem Is Its Users And Their Constant Opinions On Things

There's a saying I love: "a camel is a horse designed by committee." A variation is "a volvo is a porsche designed by committee." Some of the best product advice I've ever heard goes something like "damn what the users want, charge towards your dream." All of these statements are, of course, saying the same thing. When there are too many cooks in the kitchen all you get is a mess. And when too many people have product input, you've got lots of features but no soul.

Product should be a dictatorship. Not consensus driven. There are casualties. Hurt feelings. Angry users. But all of those things are necessary if you're going to create something unique. The iPhone is clearly a vision of a single core team, or maybe even one man. It happened to be a good dream, and that device now dominates mobile culture. But it's extremely unlikely Apple would have ever built it if they conducted lots of focus groups and customer outreach first. No keyboard? Please.

Hybrid communities

- Leverage what's already out there
- Twitter, Facebook, Foursquare, LinkedIn are (becoming) defacto standards for “social”
- Create tailored UX to match use case
- Focus on the niche, sensemaking, authenticity
